Excerpt from In the Footsteps of Pizarro: Or a Yanke's Five Years' Experience in the Klondike of South America It was with a feeling of delight, mixed with sadness, that from the Annie Larson's decks on the balmy morning of March 28, 1891, I first caught sight of Peru, that strangely fascinating land of the Inca, filled as it is with decaying monuments to his once industrial glory - tottering temples, built with mathematical precision, macadamized roads solidly constructed, farms fenced with every stone contained thereon, gold fields ditched and tunneled to the highest perfection - through which I was for the next five years to travel and explore; and of which I was destined to obtain a knowledge more accurate and concise than is to this day possessed by any other English-speaking man.
